Why did the startup I work at just get acquired? - prvete The startup I work for has just been acquired, we are now part of a much larger organization. Curious what the best market conditions were that allowed for this. Was it hard for the founders to secure funding because of things they had done and ideas they had? Do startups do better if they get acquired quickly or slowly? We are mostly focused on mobile apps. ===== orangethirty I asked a similar question during my interview at a tech company. The recruiter told me that it was a strategic move. We all knew that the company was losing money. But our leadership couldn't make the hard decisions, and had no intentions of doing so. They wanted to try to find a way to end up on a UBS conference call that could be used in their sales job interviews. After all, the investors knew that the only way their money would ever be returned to them was on a conference call. Why did they wait? They had no idea that what they had was a gold mine. They thought that it was just a niche market (i.e. sending people to jail, or something similar). I can go on and on, but the short of it is that this company could have done very well on its own. It did, however, get acquired. When in your interviews did you ask these types of questions, if applicable? ----- Ranyce We went through a similar process a couple months ago when we were acquisition rumors began circulating around the company. We were a acquisition target for a larger organization, but the partnership was just not worth it for everyone involved. We were acquired one week after launch and the deal was considered sweet, but the deal died on the vine as it turned out the product wasn't as huge of a success as everyone thought it would be. We had to determine if it was worth it to try and continue down the path of tech-focused entrepreneurship. --- prvete For us as we enter the product development phase it seemed like if the time was right to get acquired. There were a few cofounder changes as well. e79caf774b

Many of us live, work, and play on computers and mobile devices. These devices are not just for information gathering, they're in our hands or on our computers every day. We use them to communicate, to work, to watch videos, and to play games. We access them from the privacy of our homes, and we use them during the hours of the day when other people are awake. They are the central nervous systems of our lives, and this reality compels us to be mindful of the security of our devices. This paper will provide some insights into the idea of privacy on the internet, how it relates to identity, and how we can use this insight to improve the privacy and security of our personal devices. It will also present a general idea of how to secure our personal systems more effectively. When you go onto the internet, you're constantly giving up some level of privacy because your information is being shared with other users. This is the case with most network-based services. They are recording your data and processing it. This information is then sent to other users. This is the same with cloud-based services. For example, you're using Google's search or their email. Through that, they are collecting a vast amount of information about your search and email histories. They then use that information to better show you targeted advertisements and to customize their services. This is a problem when you're a strict privacy advocate, because that may make you less interested in these services. There are a few steps you can take when you're deciding which network-based service to use. You may be able to search for less-obtrusive services, such as those hosted by the cloud or individual websites. You may also want to search around and find others that aren't as interested in collecting your data. You may be able to find services that aren't ad-based, and you may be able to search for social media-based services, which usually don't collect any personal information. Additionally, you can use private search engines, which aren't indexed, or non-networks based services. If your computer uses Google Chrome, you can use DuckDuckGo, which is a private search engine, in its place. You may also be able to use Tor, which uses multiple nodes to encrypt your data and send it to a browser. They use an onion network to route your traffic and ensure privacy. You can also use services
